

Three Minute Journeys

WHERE FLOWERS ARE PLACED IN WAYSIDE SHRINES EACH DAY.

The difference in religious observance between most eastern countries and western lands is not merely a difference in beliefs, it is a difference in application of beliefs.

That is—sweeping aside all idea of comparing religion—the average man of the east practices his religion every day, while the average man of the west sets his religion apart—save as it influences his conduct—and may not think of church forms from one Sunday to another.

Perhaps it is fairer, as well as true, to say that the east distinguishes itself especially in its religion forms. Giving less thought to the application of spiritual ideas, the average eastern man spends most of religious fervor on forms.

Take the countless wayside shrines on the island of Bali, as a case in point. Everywhere you turn in country roads, village streets, in palaces or humble homes, you meet a shrine in Bali. When the farmer, warned by the low-descending sun, turns from his rice field to plod homeward, he plucks a flower and carries it in his hand. At the first wayside shrine he lays the flower before the image, says a formal prayer, and wends his weary way home.

The religion of the Balinese is a strict and formal thing. Brought into Bali by the Hindu conquerors of long ago, Brahmanism rules the minds of the average man. The particular form of the Hindu religion the Balinese observe is a curious religious structure, of which the god Siva is the center. But around Siva revolve many other gods.

Some of the gods which sway the minds of the Balinese in their worship of the Hindu god Siva are the old Polynesian deities. These, for instance, are gods of volcanoes, gods of sharks, gods of the typhoon and other primitive imaginings of ancient days. In addition, the Balinese believe in the present-day forcefulness of spirits. A veritable crowd of gods, goblins and spirits throng the uneasy mind of the average Balinese. Undoubtedly this is why the average Balinese would not think of passing a single shrine without at least laying upon the altar a flower to propitiate all these gods, and thus make safety walk with him from his field to his home in the mysterious starry night.

After Birds? No, At Home!

No, the cat is not after the birds. Just eating his dinner on the porch of his own aerial bungalow, all modern improvements, fine view, etc. The owner (and architect), Clarence Coley, of Raleigh, N. C., is watching him. Coley says cats like to be off the ground.
